A: The easiest way to force the router to connect to your own SSID with a pre-determined password is to use a "password-reset link". Google for "reset the wireless password"; these are emails sent to the devices for this purpose. If you get a password reset link, input it as the router password. The password should be there after the reset. You can also do this from the router itself by going into the settings. At the bottom left of the settings page there should be a "Forgot my password" option. Reset your password there. You can also boot up your computer and change the router password from there. Connect to the router using a wired connection. Then go to Control Panel -> System -> Maintenance. You can then change the router password. ;// i.setView(z); // } for (int i = 0; i Background ===== Autism spectrum disorders (ASD) are a group of conditions that arise in childhood and are characterised by a complex and variable range of symptoms including impaired social communication and interaction, restricted interests, repetitive behaviours and sensory processing. As well as children with ASD, there is evidence that the prevalence of ASD in non-clinical populations has increased over
