In the prior art, there are many apparatus and methods that feature input means which allow a user to input a sequence of actions which are then executed in a specific order and/or are repeatedly executed in a certain number of time increments. These type of sequential processes are usually referred to as workflows. Currently, with the development of information technology, many workplace activities are no longer performed in a manual manner. Many corporations are shifting to a modern approach to doing business in which workflow is one of the major processes employed. In this regard, many of the activities previously performed in-house, are now outsourced or performed by a third party. Businesses may outsource their accounting, marketing, engineering, and other processes either permanently or temporarily. For example, a marketing company may outsource its marketing function to a third party. Moreover, the outsourcing market is currently expanding at a rapid rate and it is expected that this trend will continue well into the future. With the outsourcing of business processes, new problems and new concerns have arisen. One of the major problems in many of the prior art systems is that they are not flexible enough to allow for the variability that is inherent in the work being performed. Thus, the user is not given the flexibility needed to handle each task as it is required by the particular job being performed. This is especially true in the case of the outsourcing market. The outsourcing business typically requires the ability to customise the workflow process according to the particular job being performed. Moreover, many of the prior art systems for conducting workflows have required highly skilled users to perform the workflows and to customise the workflows. The success of many prior art workflow systems has been attributed to the skill level of the operators who perform the business processes. As such, prior art workflow systems have not been able to attract non-skilled operators, such as those who are not highly skilled users, to perform the workflow functions. Furthermore, many of the prior art workflow systems have not been able to allow a non-skilled operator the ability to customise the workflow by, for example, allowing the operator to customise the workflow process, to choose which tasks to perform in a workflow, and to choose which parameter values are associated with the particular tasks. It is an object of this invention to provide a method and apparatus that overcomes or ameliorates one or more disadvantages associated with the prior art workflow processes and systems. By Sarah Childress CHICAGO (Reuters) - Chicago's lawsuit challenging the U.S. government's attempts to deport immigrants to Guatemala has been dismissed, a federal appeals court ruled on Monday, suggesting a new path forward for the long-running case before U.S. immigration courts. Chicago filed the lawsuit on behalf of the descendants of Mayan Indians who lived in the city before white settlers arrived in the 1800s, arguing that removal would violate their due-process rights and impose "severe hardships." The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago, one of the country's most pro-immigrant courts, ruled unanimously that Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) does not have the power to remove an entire population of people from the United States in one action, but remanded the case for further action. The decision means that Chicago's lawsuit will be heard next, perhaps by the same judges, or by another panel of seven judges. The full 7th Circuit will now decide whether ICE, a division of the Department of Homeland Security, had the power to seek removals for the Mayan descendants. "We're very optimistic that now that the 7th Circuit made this statement about how this process works and what the process is, that it's going to result in the adjudication of this case and make this case in a way that's completely fair to the Mayan family, to the Mayan community and to the people in the city of Chicago," said Carter Dougherty, one of Chicago's lawyers. ICE did not comment on the decision. In a statement on Monday, the plaintiffs argued that the 7th Circuit's ruling, if upheld by a higher court, "is a big step backwards for justice and for plaintiffs seeking a day in court against ICE's administration of President Trump's racist and unconstitutional family separations policy." ICE has faced growing resistance from some of the federal courts and a coalition of advocacy groups in recent weeks as more immigrants from countries other than Mexico face the prospect of being separated from their U.S. citizen children under Mr. Trump's "zero tolerance" policy of prosecuting all illegal border crossers. Story continues A judge in San Francisco ruled that there is no federal court jurisdiction to hear such a case, the 5th Circuit said in late April. Separately, a federal judge in New York said on Monday that the government failed to show how it would be harmful for some
