I could take the node that is the default and manipulate that. I have to try to do it. } So, this code is probably the safest way to do things. It's going to break if the plugin ever alters the name of the node, or if you change the attribute. It's going to work fine if you've already had this node and you load the model at some point later. Get a node if it doesn't exist, and set the name on it. If the name isn't what you want (as above), don't break on the name change. var node = node_tree[Node]; node.text = â
