What's new:

The Castelden The ante-room which leads to the lower gallery, was of a square form. At the farther end was a double door. These doors were of oak, curiously carved. The carvings of the doors were of flowers and strange beasts. At the top of the double door was a large brass ring. On the ring were letters, D. C. above this and R. F. below. The rest of the ring was plain. It was between these double doors that the party encountered the first of the Eyes of Ara. The figure was about six feet in height and as thin as a starved rat. It was clad in robes of grey silk. The mouth was a cavern; the eyes were unblinking, they were as hard as stone. The face was unattractive. The feet were bound in robes just as the head was, they protruded below the robe; and two thick claws, thicker than the fingers of a man, were hanging down by their sides. This first figure was exceedingly active, as it was quick to move, and faster to take a step. The party moved almost at a run, only pausing to push one of the stone chairs over. Then, they were through the door; they pushed another chair back against the far wall, then stood in the ante-room. There were nine more of the grotesque statues scattered over the chess-board to either side of the doorways. These had no head or feet, and were not wearing robes, but were attired in garments of wrought metal, like sheets of steel. These statues were motionless, and eyed the party with what appeared to be half-dead vigilance. "Beware of them," remarked Dag Daughtry, "for every one of those statues has eyes. Moreover, they are all uncanny and possess a strange power." The party moved on to the next set of doors, and entered a small square antechamber. This chamber was almost triangular
