Nozzles of the foregoing type are commonly used in the manufacture of molded articles where thermosetting resin is introduced in a mold cavity and cured to form an integral part. Examples of nozzles for such purposes are disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,684,435. In operation, the nozzle is passed through the mold aperture and thermosetting resin is introduced into the mold cavity. During the introduction of the resin, the nozzles of the aforesaid patent remain stationary and the resin is commonly introduced into the mold cavity through the interior of the nozzle. As a result, the nozzle changes in temperature as the resin is introduced which causes the resin to degrade in temperature. Therefore, the mold must be cooled to a very precise temperature to avoid the formation of voids in the molded part. The cooling time required to obtain the desired molded article is very expensive and, in the case of thermosetting resin, a very great portion of the molding cycle time is necessary to cool the mold to the desired temperature. In order to improve the flow properties of thermosetting resin, it is common to add a heating element to the nozzle which heats the thermosetting resin as it flows through the nozzle and thereby reduces the viscosity of the resin. In many applications, it is desirable to maintain the resin at a certain pre-molded temperature to permit the injected resin to cure at a desired rate. As a result, the heating element is also required to maintain the pre-molded temperature, thus requiring additional time and energy to melt the resin.

Greece has issued arrest warrants for the director and co-founder of a Bulgarian bank over allegations of money laundering. Nikola Dimitrov and his partner Georgi Angelov - who is on the police's most wanted list and is accused of criminal forgery, fraud and embezzlement - are accused of laundering vast sums of money from unlawful sources. At least £67.8m from Bulgaria, as well as from other countries, such as Cyprus and Georgia, have been stored in the bank accounts of the pair, according to an investigation by the Bulgarian daily newspaper eBiz. A spokeswoman for the Athens-based Attica regional police said the pair had not been served with arrest warrants. She said: "However, we are also using other means to request their arrest. The investigation was announced in 2009 and we have asked the Justice Ministry for additional help. "We have also announced that the hearing will be staged on July 7, with the aim to detain them." Last year, Greek authorities launched a major probe into suspected money laundering in the country. They arrested dozens of people including lawyers and some business owners while prosecutors have taken over the investigation. The investigation centres on what has come to be known as the "Copenhagen" case and specifically around the last steps of the money laundering process. "When money has finished its financial journey, it ends up in dubious transactions," Athens prosecutor Antonios Akef, who is leading the investigation, said at the time.
