To implant bioengineered muscle into a human to facilitate learning to breathe. Pilot experimental study on a single subject. Transplantation laboratory. Male human subject. Muscles obtained from one arm were harvested from the patient, sterilely processed, and reimplanted onto a piece of subcutaneous tissue within a cuff, raised at the elbow and later added onto the radial nerve for innervation. The muscles were reimplanted into a pocket created in the arm using subcutaneous tissue, which, after implantation, could easily be accessed with a syringe. After 6 mo, the subjects underwent a surgical procedure to allow them to learn to breathe by a positive airway pressure ventilation system. The capability to learn to breath was assessed using a respiratory impedance analysis system. The subject could sustain an artificial ventilatory pattern as indicated by the presence of a diaphragm strip obtained through an electromyogram. Postoperatively, he demonstrated an increased ability to handle the increased pressure of the cuff, which previously had been painful. At 8 mo, he developed a skin-related complication of the surgical wound that required corrective surgery, and he demonstrated a decreased ability to exercise. At 10 mo, the subject demonstrated an inability to perform an exercise, and a diagnosis of leprosy infection was made. Because of the severity of the infection, the subject was subsequently removed from the project. The procedure of implanting bioengineered muscle tissue did not cause any serious complications, but it was technically not easy, and the subject did not survive for longer than 10 mo. The large numbers of leukocytes and bacterial burden did not allow for any conclusions about the value of the approach. As implantation was not an end point in the protocol, we could not show any effectiveness in bridging to the learning of a natural ventilation strategy. The best young beachside pool party in all of the universe (I'm putting your name in all caps, as if this email is not subject to caps lock) would be the New York City Rad Studio Party, an annual event where over 50 tattoo and design studios all get together to display their wares and party their metaphorical asses off at the Blue Bird Café in Rockaway Beach. It's been going on since 1989, and last year it was co-founded by Marissa G. (6d1f23a050
